The elements of the workplace have varied in design, concept and implementation over a long time. Industrial workers have always been at the forefront of innovation and technology, with new developments arising from innovations in the manufacturing process itself. A significant contribution to the workplace was made by the British inventor, George Easton. In the first half of the nineteenth century, the factory revolution gradually.

Technology has changed in many ways since it began. Many now work in buildings created using new construction and engineering methods, using a wide variety of technology and equipment. In the past, technology was largely supported by skilled craftsmen, often in small shops, often working under close supervision and control. But the growth of mass production, and its inherent cost pressures, has seen a corresponding growth of centralized production and sophisticated technology. The development of machinery and the increase in the use of electricity have enabled processes to be implemented more efficiently and at a lower cost. Steadily rising wages mean that technology has also become increasingly important to the production of goods, as low unit costs have led to a continual increase in the amount being produced. The combined impact of all these factors has transformed the workplace into a technical ecosystem where people use technology to carry out their every-day tasks and work practices are constantly changing. Many workers are now required to work in an ergonomic environment that is free from the hazards and risks of previously existing technology. Such an environment has an impact upon almost all aspects of work. Advances in technology have a significant influence on the organization of work. Processes have been changed to cope with shifts in demand, to meet the needs of efficiency, and to reduce the stress associated with an increase in working time. This has also had a major impact on work practices. For example, new methods of travel have reduced the need for people to commute long distances. Changing work practices and attitudes, combined with technology, has also affected organizational structures and the relationships between employees and their managers. Problems are likely to arise wherever there is change. This is especially true of technology and of technology-based developments in the workplace. Questions have to be asked about the validity, reliability and applicability of this new technology. Traditionally, technology had been used to improve efficiency and productivity. There was little reason to question its application or use. A need to design and implement new technology could be seen to take its cue from the social and economic circumstances of the time. Within this context, changes in technology were accepted and, indeed, welcomed.
